

Dr. Kirlos N. Haroun is an Assistant Professor of Emergency Medicine at the Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine and an Assistant Program Director for the Johns Hopkins Emergency Medicine Residency. In his role, he serves as the Assistant Program Director for Community Building, where he focuses on cultivating resident and faculty connections, strengthening program culture, and fostering an inclusive learning environment. He also chairs the Faculty Wellness Committee and serves as faculty advisor for both the Resident Wellness Committee and the Resident Medical Education Committee. Beyond the residency, Dr. Haroun is the faculty advisor for the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine's Southwest Asian and North African (SWANA) student group, where he provides mentorship and advocates for equity in medicine.

Raised in Miami, Florida after being born in Egypt, Dr. Haroun has long valued resilience, adaptability, and community. He completed his undergraduate studies at the University of Miami, medical school at the University of Pennsylvania, residency training in Emergency Medicine at the University of Chicago, and fellowship training in Medical Education at Johns Hopkins University. Recently married, he is building a home in Baltimore with his wife and their two cats, embracing this new chapter of life with the same commitment he brings to his profession. Broadly, Dr. Haroun's work lies at the intersection of resident education, wellness, and diversity. His academic and leadership efforts aim to reduce burnout, promote psychological safety, and build resilient and connected communities within emergency medicine. He is passionate about guiding the next generation of physicians to thrive not only in their clinical roles but also as whole people.
